Updated as of May 29, 2018 The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission is revising its regulations to require that all tariffs and tariff revisions and rate change applications for the public utilities, natural gas pipelines, oil pipelines and power administrations be filed electronically according to a set of standards developed in conjunction with the North American Energy Standards Board. This rule is part of the Commission's efforts to comply with the Paperwork Reduction Act, the Government Paperwork Elimination Act (GPEA), and the E-Government Act of 2002 by developing the capability to file electronically with the Commission via the Internet. Upon implementation of this rule, the Commission will no longer accept tariff filings submitted in paper format. The bulk of Australia's current feedlot beef production is in Queensland and New South Wales. These States already have laws and regulations relating to the establishment and operation of feedlots, and other States/Territories are becoming increasingly involved.

Considerable variation has existed between States/Territories in the approval process and the requirements which must be met by feedlot developers and operators.

Feedlotters have complained that this lack of uniformity has deterred investment and is working against Australia's ability to compete effectively in most of its major beef export markets.
