The final objective used the matrix population model to estimate the population cost of parasitic castration, and to determine the life history traits that are most likely to offset parasitic infection. Compared to an uninfected population, parasitic castration resulted in a decrease in the population growth rate of over 41%. Self-cure offset some of the cost of castration, but the population growth rate was still 36% lower than that calculated for a population not at risk of infection. Decreasing the size at maturity has the greatest impact on the population growth rate than increases in survival or growth rate of the snails. Thus, life history evolution will likely occur in response to parasitic castration. General observations on the size at maturity in Charlie's Pond in 1984, 1989, 2002, 2005, and 2006 support a shift toward a smaller size at reproductive maturity. This research is the first to mathematically model a snail population; the results provide a theoretical framework on which hosts can offset the cost of parasitic infection.
