

Dangling Man

For my diploma paper I have chosen the American author Saul Bellow, and foreng myanalysis the comparison of his two works Dangling Man and The Bellarosa Connection. The common feature of the two is, most definitely, a main male character in distress, in a state of dangling. Joseph, the main protagonist inDangling Man, is dangling in more ways than one. He dangles between civilianand military life, between the Žold? and the Žnew? Joseph and between two women. The protagonist in The Bellarosa Connection is dangling in the Žthirty-years delay? of not contacting his friends, the Fonsteins. The generalnotion in both works remains suppression. The suppression of Joseph whoprevents himself from having or expressing any feeling or emotion, or, on the other hand, the suppression of Fonstein who remains in the shadow all his life, despite the financial success he has accomplished. Consequently, the Ždangling? is the solution, in the end, for all of us sometimes. A novel in which the victim of a series of mix-ups (which delays his entry into the army) finds himself facing a year with nothing to do, and so decides to keep a record of his time on the streets of Chicago. From the author of THE ADVENTURES OF AUGIE MARCH and HERZOG.

Saul Bellow's Heart

SAUL BELLOW- A CONTEMPORARY CLASSIC

A CONCORDANCE OF SAUL BELLOW'S DANGLING MAN.

When he visited Israel in 1975, Saul Bellow kept an account of his experiences and impressions. It grew into an impassioned and thoughtful book. As he wryly notes, "If you want everyone to love you, don't discuss Israeli politics." But discuss them is very much what he does. Through quick sketches and vignettes, Bellow evokes places, ideas, and people, reaching a sharp picture of contemporary Israel. The reader is offered a wonderful panorama of an ancient and modern world city. Like every other visitor to Israel, Bellow tumbles into "a gale of conversation." He loves it and he makes the reader feel at home. Bellow delights in the liveliness, the gallantry of Israeli life: people on the edge of history, an inch from disaster, yet brimming with argument and words. He delights not in tourist delusions but with a tough critical spirit: his Israel is pocked with scars and creases, and all the more attractive for it. Simply as a travel book, the reader finds remarkable descriptions, such as one in which Bellow finds "the melting air" of Jerusalem pressing upon him "with an almost human weight" Something intelligible is communicated by the earthlike colors of this most beautiful of cities. The impression that Bellow offers is that living in Israel must be as exhausting as it is exciting: a murderous barrage on the nerves. Israel, he writes, "is both a garrison state and a cultivated society, both Spartan and Athenian. It tries to do everything, to make provisions for everything. All resources, all faculties are strained. Unremitting thought about the world situation parallels the defense effort." Jerusalem's people are actively and individually involved in universal history. Bellow makes you share in the experience. A compelling intellectual and literary history of midcentury America In a midcentury American cultural episode forgotten today, intellectuals of all schools shared a belief that human nature was under threat. The immediate result was a glut of dense, abstract books on the "nature of man." But the dawning "age of the crisis of man," as Mark Greif calls it, was far more than a historical curiosity. In this ambitious intellectual and literary history, Greif recovers this lost line of thought to show how it influenced society, politics, and culture before, during, and long after World War II. During the 1930s and 1940s, fears of the barbarization of humanity energized New York intellectuals, Chicago protoconservatives, European Jewish émigrés, and native-born bohemians to seek "re-enlightenment," a new philosophical account of human nature and history. After the war this effort diffused, leading to a rebirth of modern human rights and a new power for the literary arts. Critics' predictions of a

"death of the novel" challenged writers to invest bloodless questions of human nature with flesh and detail. Hemingway, Faulkner, and Richard Wright wrote flawed novels of abstract man. Succeeding them, Ralph Ellison, Saul Bellow, Flannery O'Connor, and Thomas Pynchon constituted a new guard who tested philosophical questions against social realities—race, religious faith, and the rise of technology—that kept difference and diversity alive. By the 1960s, the idea of "universal man" gave way to moral antihumanism, as new sensibilities and social movements transformed what had come before. Greif's reframing of a foundational debate takes us beyond old antagonisms into a new future, and gives a prehistory to the fractures of our own era.

Eighteen science fiction stories deal with love, madness, and death on Mars, Venus, and in space.

In the desert, you see, there is everything and nothing . . . It is God without men. —Honoré de Balzac, Une passion dans le désert, 1830 Jaz and Lisa Matharu are plunged into a surreal public hell after their son, Raj, vanishes during a family vacation in the California desert. However, the Mojave is a place of strange power, and before Raj reappears inexplicably unharmed—but not unchanged—the fate of this young family will intersect with that of many others, echoing the stories of all those who have traveled before them. Driven by the energy and cunning of Coyote, the mythic, shape-shifting trickster, Gods Without Men is full of big ideas, but centered on flesh-and-blood characters who converge at an odd, remote town in the shadow of a rock formation called the Pinnacles. Viscerally gripping and intellectually engaging, it is, above all, a heartfelt exploration of the search for pattern and meaning in a chaotic universe. After being widely portrayed as a virulent racist and a traitor to his city, Professor Albert Corde, dean of the faculty of Journalism, is forced to leave Chicago. Corde is ill-equipped to handle the outrage that faces him, both as the author of several articles on Chicago's endemic corruption, and as an outspoken figure in the controversial trial of two black men charged with killing a white student. Travelling to Bucharest to visit his ailing mother-in-law, he is unable to escape the comparisons in his mind between the corrupt and dehumanizing aspects of the communist regime, and the abandoned streets of his home city. Meditating on the juxtaposition between two distant worlds, and obsessing o events that begin to unfold both in Chicago and Bucharest he begins to concede defeat. In this tormented tale, amid the swirling forces that threaten to drown his humanity, Corde slides ever closer to the brink of desolation.

"At the heart of Saul Bellow's Nobel address was his stated belief that to accept the prescriptions of those who claim the novel is dead, that Western society is crumbling, and that humankind, itself, is collectively becoming more insignificant is a mistake. Instead, he offered the counterpoint that, though there is a struggle at the center of our lives for freedom and the individual possession of the soul, humankind is ultimately aware of its power to win this struggle. "There is much more to us; we all feel it." It is up to the novelist, he believes, to bolster the spirit in this struggle, to give glimpses of the "true impressions" as Proust called them. I certainly think that Bellow, himself, has tried to fulfill this role during his long career as a novelist.

Consistently in his books, he has come out in favor of man. Yet in my reading of Bellow's books, I came to the conclusion that it was a stand which he evolved to and which was not really present in his first two novels, Dangling Man and The Victim. The main characters in those books underwent long struggles within the novels; but at their conclusions there was little evidence that they had actually overcome the powers that they had wrestled with. They had only survived; it was in 'The Adventures of Augie March' that Bellow created a character that was a match for the collective powers that live up to defeat us in life. For this reason 'The Adventures of Augie March' is the first of Bellow's novels to give us a glimpse of the "true impressions," the first to truly affirm our existence and off
