This study investigated relationships of locus of control and anxiety, with autogenic training, biofeedback, and guided imagery in a female prison population. It was hypothesized that training in these treatment modalities would increase internal locus of control and decrease state anxiety. Also hypothesized was the need for psychotropic medication would decrease, as would Institutional incident reports. The sample consisted of 86 female inmates from the Federal Correctional Institution in Pleasanton, California. The treatment program was conducted twice. In each running four groups formed: autogenic training, biofeedback, guided imagery, and control. Treatment subjects received eight weekly

60-minute sessions with the treatment modality of their group. All groups were administered Levenson's "IPC Scale" (1981) for locus of control scores, Spielberger's "State-Trait Anxiety Inventory" (1968), and a self-report questionnaire. Instruments were administered as a pretest, a posttest, and a second posttest eight weeks later. Treatment modalities were found to have an effect on locus of control and anxiety level of subjects. Also effected was the perceived health of each individual. It appears that biofeedback, followed by guided
